

Is 2,000 miles worth $88,000?

By Jim Weed

The Monterey auctions are over. Based upon the calls and texts I received during the live auctions you would have thought the Ferrari market was tanking and going down the tubes.

No doubt, there is a lot of nervousness out there. People are concerned about the future, and I get that.

I study the market and trends as part of my daily immersion into the Ferrari world. There have been times when the market appears to have no end, and other times when it appears to have no bottom.

Panic is common at either end of the spectrum. What drives the market? Generally, it is greed, opportunity, perceived investment and calamity. Nervousness can also play a part.

Contentious Presidential election seasons often cause the market to be “funny”. I counsel subscribers who want to get a feel for what is happening by either talking them off the ledge, soothing their fears or defining where I think the next market trend is going to start.

So, Monterey. After reviewing the auctioned cars and seeing the all-in pricing, while comparing those numbers to the auction company estimate range, I have come to the conclusion the market appears to holding steady.

A small number of sold Ferraris did not reach their minimums. Most of the sold cars hit the range and a few exceeded expectations. That is not a bad record.

On the surface there were some sales that appeared to be low. A Daytona at $692K versus three others all in the $850K range, but the low dollar car was not in its original color.

430 Scuderia looked like a large disparity with three offered and sold at $290K, $302K and $478K. Why? Because they had 7K miles, 4K miles and 796 miles respectively.

The 246 GTS experienced the same situation. The best one had an all original 11K miles and sold for $626K. The other two were slightly behind at $582K and $555K. A color change on one and the ‘chairs and flares’ option on the other was not enough to compete with a low mileage original.

And right when you think the market might be going flat the 550 Maranello prices were spectacular. This model was under $150K price two years ago. This weekend saw four go through with prices ranging from $268K with 15,000 miles to $417K with 1,278 miles. The other two were $280K with 4,874 miles and $368K with 2,933 miles.

So I believe overall the market is holding steady. Not increasing, and not in a freefall. Election years create a fear of the unknown. Depending on your politics it’s going to be great or disaster.

I see it differently. Once we know which way it is going to go, then we can plan our future accordingly. Right now, it’s unclear.

So, what about that title? If you don’t drive your Ferrari, you may get more money for it later. But, if you drive your Ferrari now, the pleasure it brings can make all that anxiety go away.

Your call, but I choose to drive mine with a silly grin on my face and remember, Ferraris are meant to be driven, and enjoyed!

He briefly kept the GTB/4 before trading it back to Chinetti. Recognizing the racing potential as a lightweight alloy-bodied four-cam, Chinetti decided to convert it into a GT-class racecar. The fuel system was upgraded with twin Bendix electric fuel pumps, and fuel filler was modified with an external cap. Bumpers were removed, rollbar was installed, and larger 15-inch Borrani wire wheels. In July 1968, the 275 made its competition debut as a NART entry at the six-hour race at Watkins Glen. Shortly thereafter Chinetti sold the GTB/4 to Richard Wynn of Knoxville, Tennessee, although it continued to race under the NART banner. Owned for a year in Kansas, in 1983 to Prancing Horse Farm, and then a year later to Skip Berg of Tiburon, California. During one of the more recent ownerships the 275 was involved in an accident, so the new owner decided to conduct a complete restoration including a refinish in giallo. In 1990 it was sold to Fritz Kroymans, who went on to retain possession for 20 years. Sold in February 2010 to Tom Price in California before next passing to a Swiss collector a few years later. In June 2012 certified by Classiche, issuing a White Book to preserve the racing modifications. Acquired by the consignor in 2015.
